After three decades of supporting individuals with autism and their families, I’ve come to the firm conclusion that a trusting relationship between parents and professionals may be the most important factor in helping families navigate through the often stormy seas of raising a child with ASD. There is one simple rule: Trust must be earned; it is not bestowed lightly.

The Trust - Mistrust “See Saw”

In my career, I’ve had the opportunity to observe education and healthcare professionals interacting with parents in schools, hospitals and university clinics, in activities ranging from diagnostic evaluations and informal encounters, to meetings of all shapes and sizes from the preschool years through the transition to adult services. I’ve listened in disbelief to the “war stories” shared by parents about the additional stress they’ve experienced due to the behavior of professionals. Many “problems” I am asked to address in school consultations are directly or indirectly grounded in less-than-harmonious parent-professional relationships. Also, I continue to be perplexed, as well as amazed, at how things can go so right in some situations and so wrong in others—right, when time spent together engenders trust and builds positive and collaborative relationships; wrong, when encounters create mistrust, suspicion, and even anger (typically for the parents, but sometimes for professionals as well). Such polarization probably occurs because autism is a passionate affair—full of strong emotions for all involved, which may result in professionals and parents directing emotional energy in either positive ways, or in ways that interfere with the development of trust.

I’ve observed how often well-intentioned and caring administrators, educators, and therapists stumble through the complex and intricate process of attempting to support parents. Frankly, I’ve been appalled by how other professionals allow their own judgmental attitudes, egos, and insecurities to dictate how they interact with parents. (I also experienced this first hand as a parent, when a decade ago, my then 18 month old son was diagnosed with a potentially serious medical condition, which was eventually surgically corrected. The insensitivity of some medical professionals, and their lack of training in supporting parents was inexcusable, and it was a saving grace when we finally found a professional who knew how to listen and address our concerns.) On the other hand, I’ve also seen how some parents misdirect their anger by targeting professionals who have done little or nothing deserving of such extreme reactions.

When things go right, parents are more willing to trust in the people and in the processes that are in place to support their child. Under such circumstances, there is a growing sense of mutual respect, collaboration, and a willingness to move forward as partners in the journey. Achievements and progress are celebrated, and the burdens and stresses of the difficult times are shared. Sadly, very few educators and therapists receive any comprehensive training in supporting parents from a “family-centered” perspective, especially in school settings. Professionals may erroneously believe that being a “nice person”, or having good intentions is all you need to work well with families, even those under great stress; however, without expertise in family support, when things go wrong, the consequences may include wasted time, energy, and resources, resulting in parents feeling that many professionals are simply not that helpful. Unfortunately, there may be even graver consequences. Parents may feel that school-based and other professionals are not qualified to provide the services that their child needs. This may occur even when a school district has quality services, if the parents’ initial encounters with school staff did not create a foundation for trust.
Establishing trust with parents is a delicate and intricate process, and demands far more than good intentions on the part of school personnel.

Clearly, the process of developing relationships and building trust rarely occurs with a few brief encounters. Establishing trust with parents is a delicate and intricate process, and demands far more than good intentions on the part of school personnel. The same may be said for professionals developing a sense of trust in parents, even though there is an imbalance, since professionals are most often in a position of power and knowledge, whereas parents are often in uncharted territory. Despite these challenges there are clear steps that can be taken to build and maintain trust.

The following discussion is based on personal experience, and is informed by Stephen Covey’s discussion of types of personal and professional qualities that engender trust in his seminal book, The Speed of Trust. These include the qualities of character and competence. Here, we are referring primarily to the qualities of professionals and paraprofessionals; however, these sources of trust are relevant to parents and larger systems, as well. We may think of the following as a checklist of qualities we should all strive for in developing trusting relationships.

1. Talk Straight—Most parents want to receive information clearly, directly, and with sensitivity, even if it involves a “difficult” conversation. The amount of information provided must be calibrated to parental understanding and emotional state, so that parents are able to process what is being said. We must understand that professional jargon, such as developmental delay may have different meanings for professionals (disability) than for parents (He’ll catch up). Vague information, or “sugar-coating” a child’s difficulties is not helpful. Professionals need to be clear and descriptive, and when appropriate, they need to be honest by saying, “I just don’t know”. There is so much we are all learning together.

2. Practice Active Listening Skills—Parents want and need to be heard, and there are very few people who know the child as well as the parents. Trust flourishes when professionals acknowledge the parents’ expertise about their child and demonstrate a willingness to listen to their concerns and constructive criticism. Paying full attention and providing opportunities for open communication build positive relationships. A defensive attitude that communicates, we know it all or an impatient demeanor that indicates, I do not have time to listen is insulting to parents. Active listening also involves suspending the impulse to attempt to “fix” all problems raised by parents. We must learn to distinguish between when parents just want to be heard, in contrast to their wanting tangible suggestions.

3. Demonstrate Respect and Be Nonjudgmental—Respectful and nonjudgmental language about a child and family go a long way toward developing trust. By referring to a child by his or her name, we emphasize that we see the child as an individual. When we use the words he or she excessively, or refer to a child as a member of a category (That’s what children with autism do), we are not communicating that we see the child as a unique person. Too frequently a child may be blamed for difficulties related to his or her disability when phrases such as she’s being manipulative, or he’s so noncompliant are used to explain behavior. Parents may also feel that they are being blamed. We can also communicate respect by referring to parents by their first names, or by Mr. or Mrs. ______, not simply Mom or Dad, which implies a hierarchy of status (I’m the professional, and you’re just the mom or dad.). The parents of an adult child with ASD once shared, “On reflection, the professionals we have valued most over the past 18 years were those who never judged us as parents, but joined with us on our journey.”

4. Take Responsibility for, and Right Wrongs—One of the most important trust-building behaviors is to admit when we have done something wrong; state that we regret it; and whenever possible, take actions to make things right. I have observed the healing power of both parents and professionals
Being on the same page with families about priorities for a child is an essential ingredient for trust.
action plans, and specifying who is responsible for follow-through all contribute to trust.

Concluding Comments

In a field that has become so preoccupied with choosing the so-called “right” treatment, softer issues such as developing trust with families are often lost. This is punctuated by the fact that most continuing education activities for professionals in ASD focus on educational or biomedical approaches to the virtual exclusion of training in family support. If, however, we understand that schools and other agencies are first and foremost systems of support, it puts the priority of trust in a very different light that then must become a “front burner” concern.

---

Bio

Dr. Barry Prizant is the Director of Childhood Communication Services and an adjunct professor in the Center for the Study of Human Development, Brown University. Barry has more than 35 years of experience as a researcher and international consultant to children and adults with ASD. He has published more than 90 articles and chapters on childhood communication disorders and has given more than 500 seminars and workshops at national and international conferences. He also serves on the Editorial Boards of six scholarly journals. Barry is a co-author of the SCERTS Model (Prizant, Wetherby, Rubin, Laurent & Rydell, 2006—www.SCERTS.com). In 2005, Barry received the Princeton University-Eden Foundation Career Award “for improving the quality of life for individuals with autism”. For further information about Barry’s work, go to www.barryprizant.com, or contact Barry at Bprizant@aol.com.

---

Dr. Barry Prizant’s article appeared in his column, “Straight Talk About Autism”, in the fall 2008 issue of Autism Spectrum Quarterly (ASQ). It is reprinted here by permission of ASQ. For high-quality articles like this one, please contact our UK distributor to subscribe to:

---

Autism Spectrum Quarterly

- An outstanding and highly unique publication that represents a new genre in the field of autism
- A MAGAJOURNAL that brings researchers, autism professionals, and parents together
- The “gold-standard” autism resource—high-interest articles—reader-friendly research news—exceptional authors

Subscribe Today

You may also subscribe online at: www.ASQuarterly.com